

True Origins of Thanksgiving

Despite the quaint but fictional narrative taught in school, the first Thanksgiving has nothing to do with Indians saving the early Pilgrims. Instead, Thanksgiving is actually America's National Holiday in which we celebrate our deliverance from socialism and collectivism.

The earliest recorded settlers in New England landed at Plymouth Rock in 1620. On their voyage across the Atlantic, these Pilgrims established the Mayflower Compact, which was also the first recorded instance of a socialistic political economy in North America.

Among many other things, they agreed that everyone would contribute to a common store of food and other goods, and that each person would have an equal share in its ownership and use.

Governor-General William Bradford wrote a detailed history of the Mayflower Company. In it he remarked that there was a great deal of sloth among some of the strongest and most able members, who felt it unfair that they should make a disproportionately large contribution to the common store but, in return, receive a share no greater than those who contributed little or nothing.

Consequently, much arable land was left fallow, and by Fall, the already meager food stores began to dwindle. Approximately one-third of the Mayflower Company died that first winter, most succumbing to starvation and diseases associated with starvation.

The following year, the socialistic elements of the Mayflower Compact were discarded, specifically, those dealing with this common store and its equal division among members. The institution of PRIVATE PROPERTY was re-established and vigorously defended. Members were free to work their own land, and were also free to dispose of the fruits of their labors as they saw fit.

As a consequence of the economic benefits of private property, the following year produced such an enormous bounty that these early colonists were beside themselves with gratitude to God. As a gesture of their gratitude, they established a national day of Thanksgiving, and even invited the Indians to share in their bounty.

To those with the intellect and honesty to look objectively at the plight of public education, it should come as no surprise that the charlatans who run our public schools have allowed the true meaning of Thanksgiving to be completely lost to the last several generations.

Moreover, it's doubtful they would impart its true meaning to a current generation even if they were aware of it, which few if any are. The very idiots who teach in and run our public schools would establish socialism tomorrow, if they could, never having learned the lessons of the Mayflower Compact.

Thus, they continue to impart collectivism and other forms of ignorance to their students, and rob them not only of their rich cultural heritage, but also some of the most important lessons history has to offer.
