

More Poetic Justice

Just when you thought there might never be good news again -- or anything to make you laugh -- here's an example of poetic justice to bring tears of laughter to your wintered eyes.

For a long time the DC City Council has been debating legislation to reduce the penalties for several very serious violent crimes such as car-jackings, burglary, robbery, and illegally carrying a firearm. Basically, it would eliminate mandatory minimum sentences for felons with guns.

One enthusiastic supporter of this legislation was a career criminal named Kelvin Blowe, who spent five years in prison for robbery. In December of 2021, Mr. Blowe even testified before the DC City Council in favor of the legislation.

Proving that God really does have a sense of humor, on the same day the legislation was unanimously passed by DC's City Council -- and signed by Mayor Muriel Bowser -- Mr. Blowe was killed with a firearm by another n*gger on the streets of DC.

There are conflicting reports involving the incident, but apparently, Blowe was involved in a traffic accident with another spook in a stolen car in the early morning hours of November 15th, 2022. Either Blowe or the other driver exited their vehicle and approached the other in an aggressive manner. It was at this point that Blowe was shot and killed. He was found with an illegal firearm by his side.

Although there's been no arrest following the incident, Kelvin Blowe can take comfort in the fact that his killer was an armed car-jacker or car thief, but thanks to Blowe and others like him, his murderer would NOT have been subject to mandatory minimum sentencing if he were arrested.

Without recognizing the irony, a very dull-witted niggress who worked with Blowe to enact the soft-on-crime legislation gave him a perfect epitaph: “He dedicated himself to preventing the exact kind of harm that befell him.” There may be a lesson in there somewhere...
